Canada's Wildlife Health Program

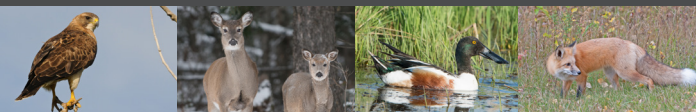

WHAT we do

We promote and protect the health of wildlife and Canadians through leadership, partnership, investigation and action.

Donors to the Canadian Wildlife Health Cooperative [CWHC] have the opportunity to support a rich array of meaningful and important programs. The CWHC provides:

- Surveillance for wildlife diseases & discovery of emerging threats to wildlife health
- Investigation of new approaches to wildlife health issues through research and risk assessments
- Advocacy for wildlife health and development of strategies to confront the effects of climate change and cumulative effects on wild animals.
- Outreach and education to empower Canadians and governments to make informed decisions about wildlife and health issues.

CANADA NEEDS A WILDLIFE HEALTH PROGRAM

Did you know?

- Wild animals are integral to our economic well-being
- Interactions between wild animals and agriculture affect international trade and our food production
- Diseases shared between wild animals, domestic animals and/or people have the potential to adversely affect health
- Increasingly the health of animals, people, and their shared ecosystems is viewed as a single interlocked system. All three components must be managed together if health is to be achieved in any one of them.

The Canadian Wildlife Health Cooperative applies the veterinary medical sciences to wildlife conservation and management in Canada. We detect and assess wildlife health issues and make sure our results are available to people who need to make decisions on wildlife management, wildlife use, public health and agriculture.
